TraCES en

Dillmann (and same goes for Leslau) does not seem to notice that this word which designates a torture instrument comes from the Arabic الهبازين. Without the Arabic dual ending, obviously. The meaning of the word is very obscure and it is certainly not Arabic, but probably Persian. It is normally translated by modern editors as “breaking-wheel,” but I am not sure it’s the right meaning. الهبازين is very common in Arabic translations of Coptic martyrdoms, in which it translates an equally difficult Greco-Coptic word, ἐρμητάριον, usually rendered as “torture-bed” (here again the translation is speculative).
